In 2003, Julie Baumer took her adopted nephew to the emergency room where he was diagnosed with a brain bleed. Baumer was later charged with child abuse, as her nephew’s brain bleed was allegedly due to “shaken baby syndrome.”

While in prison, Baumer maintained her innocence. The University of Michigan’s Innocence Project and other pro bono aid assisted in proving her innocence. Baumer was exonerated in 2010, and her charges were dropped.

How do innocent people become wrongfully convicted?
Join us November 29th to hear about Baumer’s story and how we can improve our Criminal Justice system in a Q&A discussion with Julie Baumer.
