Current Documentation

Documentation is the evidence of your disability. The report includes information about how and when you were diagnosed, the testing instruments used and the scores you attained, the interpretation of the scores, how the disability impacts your functioning in a major life activity, a brief history of how long you have been affected, and recommendations of the accommodations which could be made at the university.

The documentation must be current and appropriate for your current life-stage. In other words, for some disabilities, if you have not been evaluated since you were in grade school, we cannot accept the documentation as being current. Without current documentation, services cannot be granted.
