Researcher advances educational registry

An education researcher has spent the 2015-16 academic year in a fellowship post focused on putting together a registry that could vastly improve the structure and transparency of impact studies in education.

Spybrook

Jessaca Spybrook, educational leadership, research and technology, is completing a fellowship with the Society for Research on Educational Effectiveness. She led the registry project.

The registry, which will be pilot tested this summer, would not only inform those undertaking studies to help improve study design, but also make study details accessible to funders, policy-makers and others.

The Society for Research on Educational Effectiveness approached the Institute of Education Sciences, a division of the U.S. Department of Education, and obtained just under $1 million in funding. Part of the funding is dedicated to creating a registry that will improve impact studies and make their findings more transparent.

The society granted Spybrook a fellowship to put the registry together, working closely with Rebecca Maynard at the University of Pennsylvania and Larry Hedges at Northwestern University, the project's principal investigators.

Calls for improving transparency across the social sciences are increasing, Spybrook says. Too often, studies that produced null or negative findings go unreported, while studies showing positive results get more publicity. Those not showing positive results are stuffed in the "file drawer" and go unpublished. The null findings from well-designed studies, however, are as valuable as affirmative findings for arriving at conclusions about the effectiveness, or lack thereof, of particular programs, policies or practices.

Wellness effort taking fitness, well-being to new heights

Be well. That's the spirit behind an effort to breathe new life into the Western Wellness program and improve the well-being of employees.

To broaden its appeal and extend well-being to all WMU employees, Western Wellness offers a wide variety of programs and services throughout campus to empower employees to lead a healthy and active lifestyle. The Western Wellness website has been revamped, and several new initiatives have been mounted this summer.

One, Work-It-In Walking, encourages everyone, from non-exercisers and busy parents to marathoners, to walk at various locations around campus and record their minutes. The program began May 1 and continues through the year. To step into the action today, those interested should access their Holtyn account (or first create a Holtyn account) then log their activity.

Similarly, Western Walks is a new walking program designed to foster a culture of walking, wellness and health on campus. The program, for all ability levels, features four groups led by wellness champions that meet at different locations on campus for camaraderie and support while walking. Western Walks starting locations are 4:30 p.m. Mondays at Ellsworth Hall; 2 p.m. Tuesdays at the College of Health and Human Services; noon Wednesdays at the VI

Research team wins grant to study impact of speed on crashes

A team of three WMU researchers has been awarded a $161,802 grant from the Michigan Department of Transportation to study whether changing speed limits on Michigan interstate freeways has had an impact on crash types and severity.

The grant was awarded to Valerian Kwigizile and Jun-Seok Oh, civil and construction engineering, and Hyunkeun Cho, statistics. The team will study how changes in speed limits have impacted the frequency and severity of crashes.

In 1996, Michigan increased the speed limit along certain segments of interstate highways from 65 to 70 mph, Kwigizile says. A study by Michigan State University shortly after that found the marginal increase in speed did result in an increase in accidents.

“Since it has been a long time, the Michigan Department of Transportation wants to conduct another study to see whether those findings are still valid,” he says. “And since we have more segments where speed limits have changed, they want to expand the study that was done by MSU and get better results.”

The team will look at crash data and speed

profiles both before and after the speed limit was raised. It also will do an economic analysis that will include an assessment of the benefits of shorter travel time.

Kwigizile says studies to date have not always agreed on the impact of faster speed limits, but one finding is consistent—faster speed increases the severity of crashes.

Help break record for most vow renewals in one place

Registration is strongly encouraged for couples who want to help WMU break the Guinness World Record for most vow renewals in one place, at one time.

The attempt will take place Oct. 8 on the Grand Lawn of Heritage Hall during Homecoming 2016 in a brief outdoor symbolic ceremony. It will include commemorative photo stations, live bands performing romantic hits, interactive couple activities, wedding cake and desserts, and a sparkling champagne toast.

The ceremony will begin three hours prior to the homecoming game kickoff to provide adequate time for participants to take part in other Homecoming activities.

An information packet will be mailed to each preregistered couple one month prior to the event. Stories shared on the registration page will be posted at mywmu.com.

The event is open to any couple with a legally recognized marriage license. In addition to WMU alumni, donors, fans, employees and students, it is open to members of the greater Kalamazoo community.

Participating couples should visit the Events page at mywmu.com/homecoming to register or to stay posted on whether the required 1,088 couples have registered. Registrations are also being accepted by calling (269) 387-8746.

Hundreds of students, parents on campus this summer attending orientation

Faculty and staff members across campus are assisting with this year's orientation sessions, which began June 1 and will end Monday, June 27. Throughout the month, hundreds of incoming freshmen and their parents will be on campus. For prospective students, the event includes an overnight stay in Valley II's residence halls as well as breakout sessions and a tour with presentations around campus. Activities for parents include a mixer with faculty members and academic college breakout sessions, such as this one that took place June 6.

Most large-group activities will be held in the Bernhard Center and Sangren Hall. All members of the campus community are encouraged to assist this summer's visitors by giving directions, answering questions and helping them feel a part of the WMU family. (Photo by Mike Lanka)

On Campus with Michiko Yoshimoto

SHARING CULTURE

Thousands of area students and community members have a better understanding of Japan thanks to Michiko Yoshimoto, program manager for the Soga Japan Center.

Yoshimoto handles outreach for the Soga Center, a Haenicke Institute for Global Education unit that advances knowledge of Japan. She works on campus and throughout the state, often with volunteer help provided by WMU students from the U.S. and Japan.

During a typical work week during the academic year, Yoshimoto was putting on an after-school program for elementary students, meeting with a lunchtime Japanese club, making presentations to various classes and community groups, and teaching Japanese to employees of area businesses who will be moving to Japan. Right now, some of her time is spent preparing to stage a summer camp June 27 through July 1 for the Lee Honors College's Academically Talented Youth Program.

"Through these outreach activities, I meet lots of people and have lots of friends. I like my position because I not only meet college students from WMU, but also young children, K-12 students, families and mature adults," Yoshimoto says. "I love Kalamazoo and the Haenicke Institute. The city is very diverse, very liberal. Here, people accept difference. The institute is special because its staff members are very friendly and understand different cultures."

Yoshimoto received WMU's annual Make a Difference Award in 2014-15 for her many service contributions. But her busy schedule means she's out of the office most of the time, so those wishing to meet with her need to contact her by email to set up an appointment.

A native of Japan, Yoshimoto was seven years into a career as a local-government employee in her home country when she decided to broaden her cultural experiences and come to WMU through a Japanese outreach program that sends volunteers to U.S. sites like the Soga Center. She coordinated the center's outreach activities from 2009 to 2011, but returned to campus in 2012 as a graduate student and worked in the center as a graduate assistant.

Yoshimoto earned a master's degree in socio-cultural studies of education in 2014, then was named the Soga Center's lone full-time staff member. She met her husband, Ross, in 2010 when he was a student here. The Kalamazoo couple now have a 1-1/2-year-old son, and Yoshimoto's free time is occupied by family activities.

Researcher advances educational registry

Also, researchers report outcomes that produce estimates of impacts that are statistically significant. The reported findings often appear more favorable than they would have had all the findings been reported.

Creating a registry of studies would help ensure all findings of all studies are reported and would also improve the rigor of studies as they are being conducted, Spybrook says.

"We're not using this to rate your study. We're not using this to judge the quality of the proposal," she says. "In essence, it's going to be a service to the field to increase the capacity of people to do these studies, build accountability and transparency, and reduce some of that publication bias."

Ultimately, the registry could improve the structure and transparency of impact studies and make sure findings, both negative and positive, are reported.

Spybrook and her colleagues presented the project in March during the spring conference of the Society for Research on Educational Effectiveness in Washington, D.C. Rollout of the registry is planned for late fall.

Wellness effort taking fitness, well-being to new heights

Maintenance Shop; and 1 p.m. Thursdays at the Fountain Plaza.

Table Talks also are being offered from 12:05 to 12:55 p.m. the first Friday of each month in the Faculty Dining Room off the Bernhard Center lunchroom. Led by facilitators from Holtyn & Associates and HelpNet, discussions will center on a variety of topics impacting health and well-being today, including caregiving for aging adults, communicating with children and putting more laughter in your life.

More programs and activities will be announced at the start of the fall semester.

A big focus of Western Wellness is to urge employees to sign up for the $240 per year wellness incentive, which is deducted from health plan contributions each pay period.

Signing up to take advantage of the incentive is quick and easy by following three steps: Complete the online health risk assessment, attend a biometric screening and participate in a health coaching session.

The biometric screening can be done by scheduling an appointment with Holtyn & Associates online at holtynhpc.com; calling the Sindecuse Health Center at (269) 387-3282; or contacting individual primary care providers and having them fill out and mail in a Primary Care Provider form.

All WMU benefits-eligible faculty and staff are eligible to participate. If both spouses work at WMU, the individual paying for their benefits will receive the benefit reduction. Those who are eligible to participate but do not take their health insurance through WMU may still participate and complete a biometric assessment. But they will not receive the benefit reduction.

"We believe your future health depends on the choices you make today," says Jen Bailey, University Recreation. "Western Wellness is designed to help you take charge of your health by providing resources that you can use to assess your current health, identify risk factors and make positive lifestyle changes."

For more information, visit the Western Wellness website at wmich.edu/wellness.
