J-2 Employment Request Checklist

J-2 employment may be authorized by USCIS. The Employment Authorization Document may be issued for up to a 12-month period and may be renewed yearly. It may not exceed the program length of the J-1. J-2 dependents are eligible to apply for permission to work from USCIS through a Form I-765 Application for Employment Authorization. The J-2 dependent may begin employment only after having received the approved EAD from USCIS. The regulation states that employment may not be granted when the earnings are to be used to support the J-1 visa holder. Rather, the earnings must be used for the “Family’s customary recreational and cultural activities and those related to travel.” Source: 8 CFR 214.2(j)(1)(v)(A)

Within four weeks, the applicant should receive a notice confirming that the application has been received. The applicant will receive a case number, which may be used to check updated information on the status of the application on the USCIS website. (https://egov.uscis.gov/cris/Dashboard.do)

After the application has been processed, the applicant will receive the EAD card which is a plastic, picture ID. The card can be taken to the Social Security Administration Office to apply for a Social Security number.

The EAD card will be valid up to the expiration date on the card. It can be extended further, provided the DS-2019 for the J-1 and J-2 have not expired and the J-1 program is continuing. To extend the employment authorization, the applicant will need to resubmit all of the above mentioned documents to USCIS.

For assistance with this process, please make an appointment with an immigration advisor.

Note: Remember to verify USCIS instructions before filing. The information listed above is current as of April 2017.
